Infinity Publishing. Paperback. Condition: New. 98 pages. Dimensions: 8.2in. x 5.3in. x 0.3in. A Shot at the Title is a family drama about the discrimination against the Italians in Greenwich Village in and out of the boxing arena during the beginning of the Twentieth Century. Back in the late Eighteen Hundreds, the Irish migrated to the East Side of Greenwich Village, New York City. Although they didn't face the challenge of learning a new language, they were faced with many problems trying to blend into this new world. Eventually they were able to secure jobs and find their place in society. Then the Italians arrived. It was 1892 when Pasquale Sarubbi and his cousin, Domenico Sarubbi embarked upon a new world to fulfill their dreams. . . so they thought. They weren't prepared for the many obstacles that faced them when they first stepped foot on Ellis Island. The thought of cobblestones made of out gold quickly diminished as they encountered rejections and discrimination. These were words as foreign to them as the English language. After seventeen years of struggle, they finally found a place in this new world. Domenico Sarubbi opened a bakery. Doms wife had died in childbirth leaving him with Alphonse to raise by himself. Pasquale Sarubbi opened a cobbler shop on Prince Street, married Tressa Valenoti and had their children, Anthony, James, Philip, Bobby, Rose and eventually Joseph. Both families lived at 32 Thompson Street. Pasquales life centered around his children, his wife and his work. He was a proud shoe maker. They lived in peace. That was until Anthony, his eldest, involved himself in his first street fight. This minor street brawl evolved into a war between the Irish and the Italians in Greenwich Village. Against his fathers wishes, Anthony trains with Manager Joe Val with...
