Excerpt: . . . mucous membrane of the fourth stomach near the pylorus, it being continued along the duodenum and small intestine; the erosion being specially marked in Peyers patches and solitary glands; the mesenteric glands were also enlarged. If old spores were given to the sheep, death occurred just the same, though the interval that elapsed between their administration and death was longer. To uphold the process of animal vaccination Pasteur asserted that natural infection was much less deadly than the inoculation practised with virulent anthrax bacilli. But Koch, Gatlky, and Loffler, on the view that the above is the natural manner of infection, found that it is the reverse; thus, they gave spores in food to sheep protected from ordinary anthrax bacilli by previous vaccinations, and yet a high percentage of deaths occurred. They have examined some of the vaccins supplied by Pasteurs agent. The vaccin...
