Excerpt from Art and Archaeology, Vol. 2: July, 1915 December, 1915 The Greeks and Romans used similar figures in their minor arts, as in mirrors, vases, and thrones. Pausanias tells of examples on the great throne of Amyclaeon Apollo. It was in architecture, however, that the highest development was attained. For both Caryatids and Atlantes. The earliest instances of Greek Caryatids in architectural use were found when the Delphic treasures were excavated. These figures with Ionic costume date from the sixth century bc. They stand free from the wall and support the weight of the porch roof (fig. The light, almost fragile, treatment of the hair and the drapery is characteristic of the workmanship of the Ionic islands, and this over-elaboration, together with the lofty polos intervening between head and capital, must have detracted appreciably from the sense of stability and repose. The idea of having the maidens bear the weight through animation rather than strength was already in the mind of the sculptor, but the love of detail has somewhat prevented its expression.
